Insulated Electrodes

In using insulated electrodes there is no loss of current when the electrode is introduced into the orifice of the body. In the use of the plain - uninsulated electrodes - much of the current is lost at the first point of contact with the body. For instance, if the prostatic gland is being treated with the plain electrode much of the current is lost thru the rectal opening, but by using No. 28 insulated electrode the current is carried to the point to be treated without loss.
